The word Abstract is capitalized, bold, and centered (no italics or underline).

In this paper the findings of previous research on toddler boys and girls are described. Results from previous literature necessarily exhibit sensory seeking behaviors more than toddler girls all the time. Rather the literature demonstrates that both toddler boys and toddler girls exhibit sensory seeking behaviors when other variables are involved. These variables include preschool readiness, sensory diagnosis, individual child temperament, as well as parent involvement. Further analysis of previous research on this topic indicates that there continues to be conflicting

Before using abbreviations, spell out the complete term (followed by the abbreviation in parentheses) when it is first introduced or when the term appears for the first time within a new section. Thereafter, you only need to note the abbreviation.

In this paper we will describe that some researchers found a significant factor in the way toddlers express their behavior, however research suggests that the bigger factor seems to be outside variables. This research was important to explore due to the exceptionally high volume of Individualized Family Service Plans (IFSPs) is my local Early Intervention Program that require toddler boys to receive therapy services that support their sensory system The following review of literature and methodology design was an effective way to gain further knowledge of the topic and to determine if toddler boys exhibit sensory-seeking behaviors more than toddler girls and why?
